conditions of the oyster beds with reference to the promises for next season. It was to the promises for next season. It was feared by many that the large number of small oysters left in the beds had been seriously damaged by the late thaw's depositing mud over the young oysters or flowing foul water over them to such an extent that they would be suffocated.

The very fact, however, that the thaw was gradual is what has militated in favor of the oysters. Never before in the history of the local oyster industry have so many good beds been found. Some of them were very badly torn up by the dredges, but very badly torn up by the dredges, but have recovered to a considerable extent. Much of the increase is also attributed to the fact that the weather was so bad last winter that the oystermen were unable to take the usual large catch. Taken alto-gether the oystermen claim that the next season will show a greater abundance of private parties for ten times that amount. It is claimed by the oystermen that if the dredging laws are properly enforced during the coming season there will be absolutely no need of replanting the beds and that the natural increase will soon place the oyster industry where it was in years
